

German court issues split rulings over VW diesel cheating

November 28 2019

CDU party chairwoman Annegret Kramp-Karrenbauer takes a seat in an electric ID.3 car displayed by the car manufacturer Volkswagen at the German Christian Democrats Party (CDU) convention in Leipzig, Germany, Saturday, Nov. 23, 2019. (AP Photo/Jens Meyer)

A German appeals court has ruled in several lawsuits against automaker

Volkswagen, saying consumers who unknowingly bought cars with software installed to cheat diesel emissions tests deserve compensation but those who purchased them later don't.

The Stuttgart appeals court ruled Thursday plaintiffs could demand repayment of the purchase price, minus a portion for usage, for cars bought between 2013-2015.

The scandal came to light when U.S. authorities announced the violation in September 2015. It has cost Volkswagen some 30 billion euros ($33 billion) in fines, recalls and settlements, and several former executives have faced legal repercussions.

The court rejected damage claims from plaintiffs who purchased vehicles in 2016, saying Volkswagen's announcements after the scandal broke were "sufficient in content and scope to inform the public."

The rulings can be appealed.

© 2019 The Associated Press. All rights reserved.

Citation: German court issues split rulings over VW diesel cheating (2019, November 28) retrieved 9 April 2024 from

<https://techxplore.com/news/2019-11-german-court-issues-vw-diesel.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.
--