

Italy to pour three billion euros into Alitalia

May 7 2020

Don't call it a rescue, call it a 'relaunch'

Italy announced plans Thursday to inject at least three billion euros ($3.2 billion) into Alitalia to help save the former flag carrier from collapse in the face of the coronavirus pandemic.

Economic Development Minister Stefano Patuanelli told the Senate the money was aimed at turning the struggling company into the national airline it had been throughout much of its 74-year history.

"This is not another rescue," Italian media quoted Patuanelli as saying. "This is the company's relaunch."

Prime Minister Giuseppe Conte's government announced plans in March to renationalise Alitalia as part of a broader economic rescue for package.

It had then earmarked 500 million euros in support for the entire aviation sector.

The company filed for bankruptcy in 2017 and looked doomed in January when it failed to secure rescues from either the Italian state railway or Germany's Lufthansa.

Alitalia's management had asked government administrators in March to allow it furlough 4,000 of its 11,000 employees until more passengers feel safe enough to fly.

The carrier's main trade union announced an agreement Thursday to suspend about 6,600 employees for seven months.

Patuanelli said government administrators intended to keep Alitalia's current fleet.

"There is no downsizing at the company," the minister said.
