

Australian leader urges Facebook to lift its news blockade

19 February 2021, by Rod McGuirk

Front pages of Australian newspapers are displayed featuring stories about Facebook in Sydney, Friday, Feb. 19, 2021. In a surprise retaliatory move Thursday, Facebook blocked Australians from sharing news stories, escalating a fight with the government over whether powerful tech companies should have to pay news organizations for content. (AP Photo/Rick Rycroft)

Australia's prime minister on Friday urged Facebook to lift its ban on news access for Australian users and return to the negotiating table with media organizations, warning that other countries would follow his government's example in making digital giants pay for journalism.

Prime Minister Scott Morrison described Facebook's move Thursday to prevent Australians from accessing and sharing news as a threat.

The blockade has escalated a fight with the government over whether powerful tech companies should have to pay news organizations for content.

"The idea of shutting down the sorts of sites they did yesterday, as some sort of threat—well, I know how Australians react to that and I thought that was not a good move on their part," Morrison told reporters.

"They should move quickly past that, come back to the table and we'll sort it out," he added.

Australian news organizations could not post stories and people who tried to share existing news stories got notifications saying they were blocked from doing so.

There was public outrage at how the Facebook blockade was bungled, cutting access—at least temporarily—to pandemic, public health and emergency services.

Newspaper headlines included: "No likes for unsocial network," and "Faceblock."

An article about how fake news would replace credible journalism in Australian feeds carried the headline, "'Fakebook' shows all it cares about is profit, not people."

Some non-Australian outlets also appeared affected, with posts disappearing from Facebook pages belonging to Britain's Daily Telegraph and Sky News. Both share names with news outlets in Australia.

The blockade was a response to the passage of a bill by the House of Representatives on Wednesday night that would make Facebook and Google pay Australian media companies fair compensation for the journalism that the platforms link to. The legislation must be approved by the Senate to become law.

Google has responded by quickly working out licensing content deals with major Australian media companies under its own News Showcase model.

Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. has announced a wide-ranging deal with Google covering operations in the United States and Britain as well as Australia.

Major Australian media organization Seven West Media also reached a deal earlier in the week. Rival Nine Entertainment is reportedly close to its own pact, and state-owned Australian Broadcasting Corp. is in negotiations.

A disclaimer is shown on the bottom of Australia's Bureau of Meteorology page on the Facebook app Thursday, Feb. 18, 2021, in Tokyo. Australia's government has condemned Facebook over its shock move to prevent Australians sharing news that had also blocked some government communications. The Bureau of Meteorology's weather warnings, a Hobart women's shelter and the Betoota Advocate, a satirical website named after an Australian ghost town, were among those surprised to find their content blocked at least temporarily. (AP Photo/Kiichiro Sato)

Morrison said he discussed the Facebook dispute with Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi on Thursday. Morrison was also discussing Australia's proposed law with the leaders of Britain, Canada and France.

"There is a lot of world interest in what Australia is doing," Morrison said. "That's why I invite, as we did with Google, Facebook to constructively engage because they know that what Australia will do here is likely to be followed by many other Western jurisdictions."

Treasurer Josh Frydenberg, the minister responsible for the proposed News Media Bargaining Code, had a telephone conversation with Facebook chief executive Mark Zuckerberg after the blockade began on Thursday and again on Friday.

"We talked through their remaining issues & agreed our respective teams would work through them immediately. We'll talk again over the weekend," Frydenberg tweeted on Friday.

"I reiterated Australia remains committed to implementing the code," Frydenberg added.

Frydenberg maintains that Facebook had been having constructive negotiations with Australian media on pay deals immediately before the surprise blockade.

News Corp Australia executive chairman Michael Miller was more equivocal about Facebook negotiations.

"Having been someone who's dealt with Facebook over the past months, we have some weeks where we're getting good engagement and think we're progressing and then you get silence. I think the door is still open," Miller told a Senate inquiry into Australian media diversity.

"While Facebook may have moved away, they don't move out," Miller added.

News Corp. owns most of Australia's major newspapers and some analysts argue the U.S.-based international media empire is the driver for the conservative Australian government making Facebook and Google pay..

"This legislation is pure protectionism out of the brain of Rupert Murdoch to try to create a tax on his competitors," Jeff Jarvis, a journalism expert from the City University of New York, told ABC recently.

Facebook said on Thursday the proposed Australian law "fundamentally misunderstands the relationship between our platform and publishers who use it."

Morrison said his government was "happy to listen to them on the technical issues," but remained determined to pass the law.

"It's not OK to unfriend Australia because Australia is very friendly," Morrison said. "We'd like to remain very friendly and it's time for them to friend us again."

© 2021 The Associated Press. All rights reserved.

This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed without permission.

APA citation: Australian leader urges Facebook to lift its news blockade (2021, February 19) retrieved 20 April 2021 from <https://techxplore.com/news/2021-02-australian-leader-urges-facebook-news.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.